

West Basin Project Faces Abandonment

Engineers and attorneys representing agencies concerned will meet, before July 18 to determine what can be done to save the $480,000 sea water control experiment started in the West Basin.

The project is jeopardized because of inability to obtain all of the waivers required by the state indemnifying it against liability if wells located inland from the project were damaged by the intrusion of salt water.

Unless necessary waivers can be obtained, the project will have to be terminated with the least possible additional expenditure unless the district develops some other recourse to hold state and district free from damages arising out of its operation.

Course of action was decided at a Wednesday meeting of the executive committee of the West Basin Water District Association and representatives of the Flood Control District.

Basin Threatened
Consensus of the executive committee was the collapse of the sea water control experiment would probably cancel out many years of effort aimed at rescuing the basin from progressive engulfment by ocean water, and would be likely to destroy all chance of maintaining the basin as a holder of fresh water.

Final decision will be made at the July 18 meeting of the State Water Resources Board, which is supervising the work being performed by the Flood Control District.

West Basin Water District has under preparation a detailed map of the Inglewood area recently annexed. When completed, the map, together with certified description of boundaries of the area, will be filed by the district with the State Board of Equalization.
